deeper

deeper

if relationships were houses, i would want to build castles.
starting from the humble ground and working my way up to the clouds.

fueled by muffins,
propelled by the power of laughter,
growing little by little each and every day.

for the first time,
i would learn that the opinions of others can't stop me from construction because castles are a lot bigger than people, anyway.

so higher i build,
until i remember
heights have never been my thing and splattering thirteen towers down won't make for a very good love song.

so instead of up,
i work down into the ground.
proving to the world [and internally, maybe to myself] that just because others cannot see my progress as they walk by,
there is a whole lot more hidden beneath the surface; i promise.

so i build a castle
fit for royalty,
when in reality it is only for you and me.

our shelter from the world outside, because we are deeper.

we are deeper.
